Excerpt from On the Comparative Value of Caustics and Astringents in the Treatment of Diseases of the Conjunctiva, and on the Best Mode of Applying These Remedies The tendency of this affection is towards a disappearance of the symptoms at the end of a few days, even when no treatment is employed. Therefore, no active remedies of caustic or astringent nature are needed, and they tend to delay rather than hasten the recovery. Calomel or other insufflations are similarly useless. All annoying remedies are moreover objectionable on account of the age of the majority of the patients. Simple lotions, cold or tepid, with water, or milk and water, may be used. Two or three times a day, a few drops of a solution of ten grains of borax in an ounce of water, or of camphor water, may be dropped into the eye from a teaspoon or a drop-tube. This usually proves a soothing and refreshing collyrium, grateful rather than painful to the patient, and appears to have a sufficiently astringent and stimulating effect to promote absorption of the papulae. Although...
