Brand New Book  Print on Demand .Excerpt from Praxiteles Busts, statues, clay models, drawings, etc. In the background a girl mixing clay. Prax. [Seated in a despondent attitude.] I cannot work. And yet I rose this morn with every pulse athrob. While these dull laggards of the city here lay wanton in their beds, or dead in sleep, I hied me with quick step towards the shore. Then morn rose from the sea like one great pearl, gray orb'd and lustreless; and then, as if it had a heart, life's red suffused it all. Then to an opal did it turn, and blazing lay in shimmering iridescence. Such green, such red - the vine-leaf and the wine. Then rose the sun, and morn lay shining there a glistening diamond in sea's sapphire cup. One moment's breath, the long, white sea-sands o'er, brought me the smell of salt, of ooze, of brine - a smell of distance, borne from isles afar. I stripped and stood there naked, all alone, a living whiteness on the dead sea-sand. Then I forgot myself and sat me down - forgot myself, the shore, the world, the sea - full only of a vagrant, antique dream an unshaped beauty I had never caught. I strove to mould it in the fickle sand - that dead, dull sand, which, being dry, cohered not - being wet, did flow. And then I spurned the sand and sprung to foot, and revelled in my naked, living self, rejoiced to think I was a man, not clay. Then did I wade out in the clear, blue deep, and sank my body underneath its waves till the sea, like a...
